Of the two extraordinary performances of de Oro against Kieckhefer, one is a record, the other is not. Asked for a decision upon them, Charles P. Miller, vice-president of the Brunswick-Balke-Collander Company, ruled that the score of 150 points in 145 that the score of 150 points in 145 innings was a record and that 50 points in 35 innings was not.

The Close Average

The average number of strokes per round for the twenty years shows again the closeness of the competition:
Vardon, 77.96 strokes to the round.
Taylor, 77.97.

When these contenders travel in this compact situation for so long a time it would take a hold expert to say that one was better than another, or that one was better than another, or that any difference existed great enough to be recorded. Of the three Taylor got the first jump; then Vardon followed, and after this came Braid—where, for the twenty years the championship count stood as follows: Vardon, 6 championships: Braid, 5 championships—the great trio having won 16 out of the 20 title events from two decades ago.

After an exhaustive investigation this university announced that there was nothing discovered in the baseball vernacular which persons frequenting the stands and bleachers during the season did not understand fully and that the popular demand for the use of baseball slang in published reports was unquestionably so great as to preclude its elimination.

And so from that day to this the public has not been called upon to read any further condemnation of baseball reports as written by the overwhelming majority of sporting writers throughout the good old U.S.

Some of the most familiar terms used in baseball reports have been banded down from generation to gen-
